"CONSCIENCE FUND" NETS $1,000 YEARLY

U. S. Gets Back Many Dollars from Those Smitten by Regret for Duplicities.

At least $1,000 a year is paid the United States government by conscience-smitten persons.

Officials of the Treasury have often pondered the question, "What is the price of a clear conscience?" and have come to the conclusion that no other commodity fluctuates so greatly in price.

On the ledgers of the Treasury Department appears the item, "Conscience," and a study of this reveals the various prices paid for clear consciences. There is an almost steady flow of money into this fund. The department has printed a blank form for announcements of contributions to the conscience fund. The announcements never give the names of the contributors. They merely say that a certain sum has been received in a letter, the postmark of which is given to be credited to the conscience fund.

Sometimes letters accompany these contributions and sometimes they come with merely a line asking that the money be added to the fund. Occasionally an envelope containing nothing but the contribution is received. In such cases the department always knows why it is sent, and credits it to conscience.

It is contrary to the policy of the Treasury Department to prosecute persons sending in conscience money given in cases where it is known that the mind of the sender has been troubled because of some outright fraud. The department takes the attitude of "Go thou and sin no more."

Not long ago a Michigan man sent the Treasury Department a check for $200. In a letter accompanying the contribution he explained that he was a boy during the civil war and lived near one of the great battlefields. Following the rout, this boy caught an army mule which had evaded other pursuers, and hid the animal in the woods until the summer character of the mule was clear. This mule on his father's farm, of which he was in charge while the father was in the army, and retained possession of the beast until it died. Fifty years afterward the boy, grown to be quite an old man, sent in his check for $200 to clear his conscience.

THE GREAT WHITE WAY

By O. O. MINTYRE.

New York, Jan. 1.—William Travers Jerome, ex-district attorney, is an inveterate cigarette smoker as are a number of other legal luminaries before the New York bar.

While trying a recent case, Mr. Jerome joined a number of lawyers in an ante-room for a few puffs. The room soon filled with smoke and it was noticed that a little, weakened up man in the corner was coughing and wheezing at a great rate.

A window was opened and the little man finally expelled the smoke from his lungs and glowered at the assembly. "You men ought to be ashamed of yourself," he scolded, "poisoning the air with those terrible sickening fumes." And then he stormed out.

"Who is that?" some one asked.

"Him?" was the reply. "Why he's one of the attorneys for the Tobacco Trust."

The retirement of Otto H. Kahn from the active participation in the affairs of the Century Opera Company will be a distinct loss to those who hoped to have popular priced opera in New York.

The Metropolitan has always been a too expensive proposition for the music lover of moderate means and the Century looked like the one way out.

Mr. Kahn himself backed the Century to the tune of $75,000 out of his own pocket, and then passed up the reins to others. Another appeal to the public is to be made—but the public is getting mighty tired of charity appeals.

New Yorkers like to poke fun at smoky Pittsburgh and Cincinnati, but the other day the lower end of Manhattan got a taste of darkness itself. The morning broke bright and clear but about 8 o'clock a sudden black fog fell and it was necessary to light all the office buildings and even the street lights.

In a letter accompanying the contribution he explained that he was a boy during the civil war and lived near one of the great battlefields. Following the rout, this boy caught an army mule which had evaded other pursuers, and hid the animal in the woods until the summer character of the mule was clear. This mule on his father's farm, of which he was in charge while the father was in the army, and retained possession of the beast until it died. Fifty years afterward the boy, grown to be quite an old man, sent in his check for $200 to clear his conscience.

licly. "I don't want anybody on the jury who can lie like that."

It would take an outsider some time to digest the idea that the close passing through pressing financial difficulties if said outsider could have been in the Lohr Beit on New Year's Eve. Not a table was to be had two weeks before the fatal evening and the usual stunts were pulled off. Young men in dress suits waded through hotel lobby fountains and giddy old timers at the opposite sex poured wine into their slippers.

As the Weekly Eagle would say, "pleasant time was had by all."

The cigarette ban for women was lifted in every hotel and several women were seen smoking cigars around the Washington Square section.

A learned Chicago professor has written an article entitled "Forty Ways to Fool the Stomach" without mentioning dropping a penny in the New York subway slot machines and finding them empty.

DAILY SHORT STORY.

JULIA'S JEALOUSY.

By JEROME SPRAGUE.

(Copyright, 1914.)

The engagement of Julia Ward and Philip Hargrave was the most surprising of a village society. Somehow it seemed strange that Julia, with her most apparent pettiness of character, should have chosen a man of such a sudden black fog fell and it was necessary to light all the office buildings and even the street lights.

In a letter accompanying the contribution he explained that he was a boy during the civil war and lived near one of the great battlefields. Following the rout, this boy caught an army mule which had evaded other pursuers, and hid the animal in the woods until the summer character of the mule was clear. This mule on his father's farm, of which he was in charge while the father was in the army, and retained possession of the beast until it died. Fifty years afterward the boy, grown to be quite an old man, sent in his check for $200 to clear his conscience.

the ring from her finger, hoping Hargrave would stop her, but he did not.

"Thank you," he said. "I will escort my sister's friend about until she leaves. I am sorry you could not have trusted me, but it is best to know these things before it is too late." He bowed to Julia and left her to her fate.

Out in the street Hargrave felt the sudden breaking of his illusions. His love for Julia had been more or less deep, but he did not regret having learned in time of her potty nature. He did, however, resolve to pay a visit to the new palmit and tell her just what he thought of people who upset hysterical women.

"I hope," mused Hargrave, "that I can persuade this fortune teller to vacate this village before she upsets any more apple carts."

Because he had seen the neat little signs of the palmit in one of the upper windows above a tea shop it did not take him long to find the trouble maker. Upon entering the softly lighted room Hargrave drew back. Certainly he had heard a woman crying.

"She's been forecasting more dire events," he told himself wrathfully, "and has brought her victim to tears."

He knocked on the table so as to make his presence known. The sound of weeping stopped suddenly and a slim figure came through the doorway.

She stood for a second trying swiftly to hide the trace of tears.

Hargrave gazed blankly at the girl. "Have you come to have your palm read?" she asked.

"Hardly," Hargrave said with a short laugh, then asked quickly, "But what is the matter here and why have you been crying? Is there anything I can do for you?"

"No," the girl said in a hopeless voice. "I just thought I could earn my living reading palms, but there hasn't been a single palm in this room since I opened it and I have no other means of earning a living." The girl was as frank as Hargrave himself and he found himself drawn to her by some subtle emotion that for the time being he was only started at.

"He knew, too, that Julia's story had been fabrication by which to trap him, and he again thanked the day for having given him an insight into her true character."

"When I was in college," the girl continued because Hargrave was silent, "every one wanted her palm read; now—because I have to read them—no one wants to know the future." She smiled through her tears, and Hargrave gasped at the witchery in that smile.

"I know my future and here," he told himself inwardly; "but I suppose it will be some time before I can definitely tell her so." He looked at her earnestly at the girl, as if trying to make her realize the sudden emotion that had come over him, but all he said was, "I have a desk in my office, but no girl to sit at it and take down addresses and answer the telephone—I wonder—"

"You will not have to wonder long," the girl smiled softly back at him. "I know you are doing this to help me and I am very much in need of help. Perhaps in a short time I can find something else to do and your office chair will be free for some one who can really serve you." She looked again into Hargrave's eyes, but found it difficult to meet the expression there.

"Oh, yes," he told her with a soft laugh, "we certainly will find something else for you soon." And if there was the picture of a tiny cottage on Willow lane before Hargrave's eyes he did not tell the girl about it—just then.
